When she was 9, Canadian Faith Dickinson made a fleece blanket to comfort an aunt who was going through chemo treatments. Seeing how much it meant to her aunt, Faith decided to keep going. Her non-profit Cuddles for Cancer has now made and gifted thousands of blankets to people going through traumatic times. And Faith is going into schools to talk to other young people about getting involved in service. You can find more about her here.

Canadian students Ishan and Vishal Vijay decided, after a visit to their parents' home country, India, that they had to do something about the poverty they saw there. The result is EveryChildNow, a nonprofit that's enlisted other young people in helping the Vishay brothers provide necessities and education to kids all over the world. Find out more here.

Ten-year-old Brit Max Woosey inherited a tent from a neighbor in Devon UK who died in hospice care—it came with a message to "have an adventure." Max decided his adventure would be raising money for Hospice, asking people to donate for every night he slept in the tent in his backyard. The first nights produced so many donations, Max kept going—for three years, through heat, cold, winds, hail, and even when he had Covid. He raised over £750,000. The full story is here.
